The Educated Hamburger

"My cousin Emma is giving a party this Saturday night," remarked Jeff Hull to Helen Whalen. "Having a small group up."

"What's the special occasion?" asked Helen. "Seems to me she had a party last month. It can't be her birthday. I know she had that party in March."

"I don't think you really know my cousin Emma," teased Jeff. "She really doesn't need an excuse or an occasion to give a party. She just happens to like giving them. Her father says she has only one future. She must marry an Ambassador. She will be the perfect hostess for Emma is in her glory when she entertains. And let's not get off the subject. You are invited. I'll pick you up at eight."

There was a sad look on Helen's pretty face. She pouted a bit and shook her head in the negative.

"No can do this Saturday night," she finally replied.

"Don't tell me you have a date with somebody else. I just won't believe it. How can I breathe this oxygen and know at the same time I have a rival? Quick, lead me to him. I'll give him a one way ticket for the next space bound for Mars. That ought to keep him out of circulation for a couple of thousand years. Especially if it happens to be a local going the wrong way."

"Silly boy," grinned Helen. "You know right well you haven't a rival. I just have to help Dad at the Hamburger stand. It's hard to get and keep good help. This Saturday Dad expects a lot of business. If you could figure out someway to get a hamburger to take care of itself that would solve matters."

"Maybe you ought to ask for a Mountain or a Volcano to come over," snapped back Jeff. "But the problem you give me is a tough one. Alas, we have had no educational system in the past that considers such an important matter. We really need an educated hamburger. One that will go onto the charcoal grill or hot stove, turn itself over, then creep into a nice bun. Add the mustard and relish and finally tell the customer: "I'm ready for you to eat me." Ah, that should be the problem to be considered next by our Scientific Counsel at Washington."

Jeff did his best to try to get Helen to change her mind. But all of his pleas and insistence were to no avail. He left her and drove over to Emma's home. His uncle Frank was seated comfortably on the porch.

"How's my favorite nephew today?" greeted Frank Lawton. "Get that sad look off your face."

"Get it right off your face this second. Don't delay," interrupted the friendly voice of Emma Lawton who came from inside the house. "Had a quarrel with Helen?"

"She can't come this Saturday night," explained Jeff. "She has to work at her Dad's place."

"Isn't there some old saying about a mountain? I think it is to the effect that if the Mountain won't come to Mohammed, he would go to the Mountain. Or maybe it was the other way around. So don't worry, Jeff. If she can't come to the party, the party will go to her."

"Won't work," pointed out Emma's father. "You must always remember the matter of pride. Never injure or hurt the pride of any person. Especially if said person happens to be a female. Now if you ever wish to marry an Ambassador you must remember that little detail. If you brought your friends over to her father's place, you would definitely hurt her pride. Am I right Jeff?"

But Jeff wasn't paying the slightest bit of attention to what was being said. His eyes were riveted to a newspaper. He was looking at an advertisement.

"I got it, I got it," he shouted. "I think I know the solution to the entire thing. How you can bring your friends over to her fathers place. And not hurt her pride because she won't be working at all."

"Think the heat has affected Jeff's brains?" asked Emma.

"I'll be back for supper," said Jeff. "Got a lot of things to do."

He rushed from the porch down to the driveway where his car was parked. Then he soon was on his way to the city of Logansville. Half an hour later he stopped in front of a place called: The Griddle. There was a big machine in the window. Pancake mixture was dropped on a rotating heated circular frame. Then an automatic arm turned each pancake over. Finally the pancake was lifted and placed onto a plate that had been warmed. Jeff went into the store and asked for the manager.

"I'm Jeff Byron," he told the man.

"Glad to meet the son of our bank president," replied the manager "I know my loan isn't overdue at the bank. So this must be a social visit. Ask for anything in the place and it is yours. Go and try some of our new pancakes."

"Where did you buy the machine that does the work formerly done by a smiling female or a serious man?" asked the young man.

The manager went behind his desk and took out a portfolio. He went through several bills and then came up with the right one.

"From the Henderson Hotel Supply Company. You'll find them on Main and Pine Streets at the intersection — right opposite the old court house. Use the phone and tell them you are coming if that's what is in your mind."

Mr. Henderson had planned a round of golf. But a visit from the son of the bank president was for the moment more important. So in turn he called up his friends and postponed the game even though it was a pleasant lovely day. When Jeff Byron arrived he greeted him warmly.

"Anything in the place is yours!" he smiled.

"Who invented the machine that makes pancakes automatically?" asked Jeff.

"There are a series of patents on different pancake machines," explained Mr. Henderson. "The one I sold to The Griddle happens to be my own invention. A very efficient machine if I have to say so myself. Only trouble is that the number of restaurants and other food places that would buy them are limited."

"I have an idea that might turn your machine into the nation's biggest business deal of the year," asserted Jeff.

"My ability to recognize genius is one hundred per cent," snapped back Mr. Henderson. "Give me the idea and if it works we are partners."

For the next half hour, Mr. Henderson listened to details. Then he took off his coat and started to work on one of the machines.

"By Friday afternoon I should have it working. I'll give it a test run. You contact Mr. Whalen. Tell him my crew will install it early on Saturday morning if it is O.K. with him. We'll have it in working shape and give the world a surprise. Then get the sign man. This is it!"

Jeff went back to have supper with his Uncle and Emma. He told them only part of the news.

"You can have the party out at Helen's place. This is going to be something new. But you must get Helen away from her Dad's place during the morning and afternoon. Don't ask questions."

"For my favorite cousin, his slightest desire is an order," replied Emma. "It shall be done. Now let me call up my boy friend and speak to him."

Early Saturday morning, Emma and her boy friend, Bob Simpson picked up Helen. They drove out to another town. Bob Simpson wanted to look at a special present for Emma. And Emma would only buy it if Helen gave her O.K. It was dark when they brought her home. She then took her car and went over to her father's place. But something had happened. There was a big sign which read: "The Educated Hamburger. People were standing on line to watch a machine. A roll would go onto it. Then the raw meat. The meat was heated, relish placed on it, and onto a plate it went.

"I don't understand what happened," muttered Helen. "There isn't anything for me do do."

"Except come and join us," interrupted Emma. "I brought the crowd out here. I wonder if you have the slightest idea in the world what this means?"

"Only that I don't have to help Dad with hamburgers," admitted Helen.

"Wrong," said Mr. Henderson who had been only a quiet observer up to that moment. "Your future husband has a half interest in this idea. He was rich up to yesterday. But I would say he will be a millionaire. Oh yes, so will I."

And so that is how the famous automatic hamburger machine was invented. Just because a fellow wanted his girl to have some free time. You'll see the stands from coast to coast. If you also happen to want pancakes, you can get them from a similar machine. Bet this makes you hungry! What do you want on your hamburger — mustard, catsup, or relish? The machine can give you your choice — or all of them!
